VANITAS.

A LAY SERMON.

In one of his minor poems, Goethe relates the experience of a somewhat wayward youth, searching, like Rasselas, for that imppy "choice of life," which has no polson in its chalice. Failing at the outset in the pursuit of wealth, he quits his bankrupt coffers to seek solace in the aniles of womankind. Trited in that quarter, he spurns his father land for like ngly sings : Now, I've set my hours nown nothing, you see :

And so the world goes well with me.

The world is full of pilgrims, coming to the same unprofitable half—counterparts of Goethe's hero, not perhaps to the wassall, but little else in the practical uses of life—men, it may be, fervent to be born good.

THE EVENING BELL.

It was a Sabbath afternoon. The folling of the church bell in the distant town, calling to evening worship, was the only sound that broke the stillness of status of another degenerate republic:

"Like no exhausted mother, Bosne had lost the power of producing tudy good and great men, and become incapable of enjoying political freedom, which prospers only when supported by the manly virtues of a nation."

In the multitude—the source of power—exists the source of decay. When reverence for justice waxes feeble and the love of right becomes inconstant—when the obligations of good eit.

It was purfect harmony with the repose of all animate and inanimate nature. It seemed like the world's farewell to day.

There is something in the music of distant bells, whether intended to speak the language of joy or sorrow, indescrib-

It is the apathy of the church, the vanity of profession without practice, the catentation of a piety that is as much a matter of fashion as the geograps of a milliner's window, that so often render our religious organizations little less than nominally christian, and sap their vitations in the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most only the learner of the country, and in its most of the country. nominally christian, and sap their vitality until they become the mock of the worldly-wise and unbelieving. Hence proceeds that sentimental aversion to a "live" practical, soul-grasping gospel; hence it is that what the poet Thomson describes as the "round, fat, only men of God," on salaries equal to their "style," described the process that they had been said, with their painted hills as dry as if they had never known any other in the sands. draw better houses than the "lean and they had never known any other of hungry" devotees of the mission chapel: ment than that upon which they restricted hence the kid-gloved zeal, the stint of hence the kid-gloved zeal, the stint of fraternal effort, and all else unlike the smooth and motionless.
